tences is often far other than the builder of States. A man may for years attack and defend various public measures with vast learning and dexterity; he will overflow with language in showing "how to do it"; but is dumb when compelled to achieve an immediate, wise,

Men of executive power, in all countries, have often been preferred by the people to brilliant speakers. Washington, Jackson, Taylor, and Harrison were neither of them orators; but their contemporaries and rivals were among the most eloquent men of whom America can boast. "It is the nature of party in England," says Lord John Russell, "to ask the assistance of men of genius, but to follow the guidance of man of character, "Caress literary men and philosophers," said Napoleon; "but do not take them into your counsels."

But Gen. Grant acts cloquence; the But Gen. Grant acts cloquence; the brave words of other men he puts into deeds; what orators splendidly say, he silently docs. "Speech is silver," say the proverb; "but silence is golden. More public men have been injured by the fatal facility of fluency than by voiceless action. The highway of political life is marked by the graves of eminent men whose epitaph might be written, "Died of a speech," or "Killed by writing a lette"."—Phelps's Life of
